Parents told the principal of Northbridge School that computers were destroying family life. Principal Caroline Stobart asked them what they meant and one mother said that she couldn't get her family to eat a meal together. She said that her daughter wouldn't stop chatting online at mealtimes. Another parent said that her 13-year-old son spent six hours at his computer the previous Saturday. One parent then asked the principal if she could suggest ways of dealing with the problem. Ms. Stobart asked the parent what steps they had taken so far. One worried father said that he was going to keep his son's laptop locked in a drawer starting the next day. He said he would only give it back to him for specific homework projects. There weren't many parents who felt that their children had a balanced approach to computer use.

Sports Minister Andrew Morgan won his court case today against The Globe.

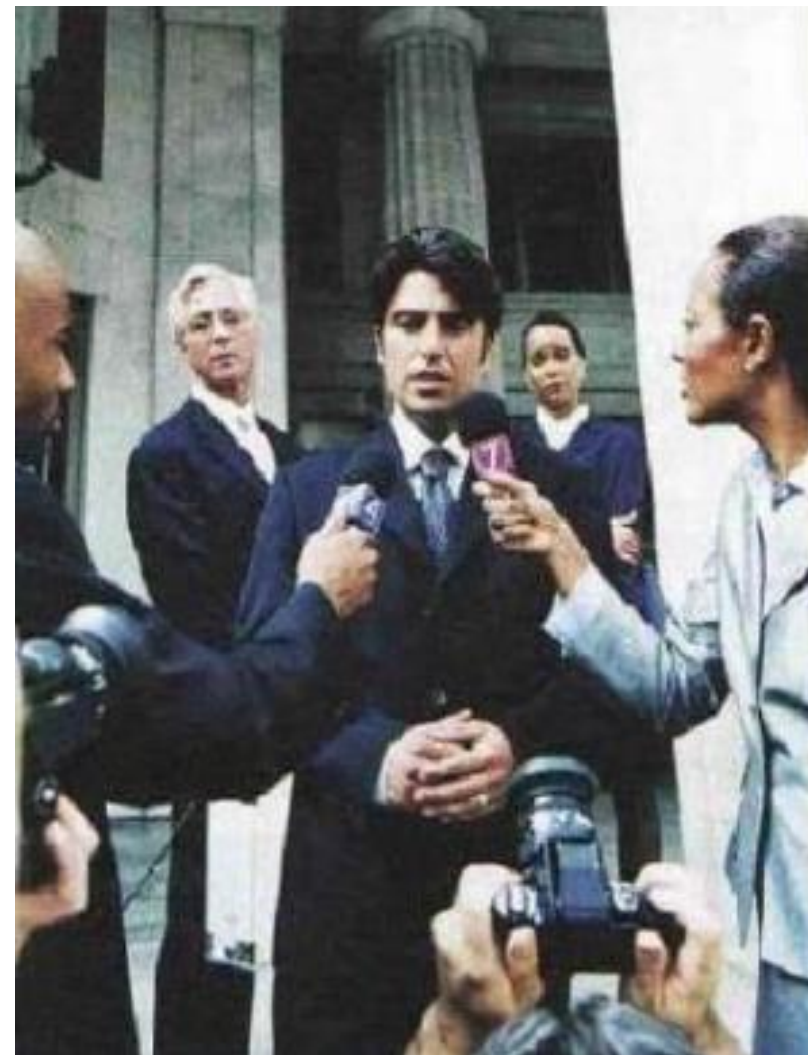

The newspaper claimed in March this year that Mr. Morgan had used taxpayers' money to buy his new luxury apartment in London.

Mr. Morgan refused to admit doing anything illegal and said he would speak to his lawyers the following day. Although some of his political colleagues had advised him not to take The Globe to court, Mr. Morgan decided against taking their advice. His lawyers supported his decision and today Judge Simmonds ordered the newspaper to pay the Minister €250,000. After the case we asked Mr. Morgan how he felt about the result, and he told us he was delighted. When asked what his plans were now.

Mr. Morgan said he would be at work the following day as usual.
