When they finally met, they were surprised by how much they had in common. For most of their adult lives, their jobs had been related, even though they had not been working in the same business. Mark had been making furniture, and Peter had been selling furniture. Mark had been interviewed for jobs in furniture stores and decided to take a position at Mark's store. Peter had been talking to a customer when he saw a man who looked just like him walk into the store. Peter stopped what he had been doing and introduced himself. That first day, Peter and Mark talked for hours. They found out that they had not been living in the same city, but they had attended schools in the same district for most of their childhood. They had been crossing paths for many years without ever meeting. They have never expected to have so much in common.
